P R E F A C E.

THE curious and profitable application of this nation, to learn the principal foreign languages of Europe, has encouraged the printing of several Dictionaries, necessary to facilitate the learning of the said tongues; of which the most useful and necessary, to an English young merchant is, I believe, the Spanish language, for the extensive and rich trade carried on with Spain, in Europe, and in the West-Indies. At the end of the last century, was published by one Minshew, a very imperfect and defective Vocabulary, in Spanish and English, without any explanation of the several meanings of words, neither of expressions; some years after, appeared the Dictionary of Captain Stephens, that ought to be called rather a faulty collection of the most witless consonances under the name of Proverbs, with ridiculous commentaries upon their true sense and origin.---Omitting these expressive adages, these short and admirable sentences multa paucis, these wise maxims expressed in few words, and admired by all the learned, in the Spanish language. At last, in 1740, appeared a Dictionary, whose ignorant, selfish, and obstinate writer, having before his eyes, the most learned and useful work upon the Castillian language of the Royal Spanish Academy of Madrid, followed an ortography quite contrary to the true etymology of words, to the common present use, and to reason. Instead of inserting a great many expressions and words that he omitted, as well as the explanation of them, he stuffed his Dictionary with silly tales and stories, with ample and useles descriptions of Cities, Villages, and Rivers of Spain and America; he added to this, pedantical declamations against the Pope, the King of Spain, and the Spanish nation, without any reason or motive; so he made a performance worse than any other of the same kind, and very unvendible for his Booksellers, as they have experienc'd it. This induc'd me to undertake this work, and to lay down in it the new, modern and approved Ortography, established by the Royal Spanish Academy, whose observations I have followed, being admitted as rules by all the learned in Spain, and approved of by all the modern writers of that nation. It was high time, nay there was an absolute necessity to make a new Spanish and English Dictionary: for all languages alter by time and custom; and the Spanish has received so many alterations, that nobody can pretend to learn it in perfection as it is now spoken at court, and used by modern authors, without new instructions. The ç called cedilla, which was so much in use before, is now left off, and the reasons for it, the reader will find in my observations upon the z substituted in its place. Some of the Spanish words are softened, and others altered, as more conformable to their etymology from the latin; as instead of Coraçon, we say Corazón; for veces, dezír, hazér; veces, decír, hacér; instead of estoy, doy, Reyno; estói, dói, Reíno; for dava, iva, devo, escrivo; daba, iba, debo, escribo; for cavallo, gobierno; caballo, gobierno, &c.

All these alterations, and many others, have been made by the Academy of Madrid, in its Dictionary, which is the only standard for all those who aim at speaking and writing correctly the Spanish Language.

A NEW

D I C T I O N A R Y,

SPANISH and ENGLISH.

A, The first letter of the alphabet in all languages, and the first of the five vowels.

A is sometimes an article which marks the dative case either singular or plural; ex. à Pedro, to Peter, à los hombres, to the men.

A marks also the accusative case; ex. amo a Pedro, I love Peter.

A, in Spanish, sounds always like a in these English words, tall, war, call; ex. cadaver, a corps; abanico, a fan.

A, f. f. ex. una buena A, a good A; una A bien hecha, an A well made.

It is used likewise before the articles el, la, and los; ex. à el hombre to the man; à los Ingleses, to the Englishmen.

A is a preposition, which signifies to, into, at, &c. ex. ir à Roma, to go to Rome; ir al campo, to go into the country; à las tres, at three o'clock; à veinte leguas de aquí, twenty leagues off; a dos dedos de tierra, within two inches of the ground; à razón de seis por ciento, at the rate of six per cent. a la derecha, on the right hand.

A is also a particle which has several significations; sometimes it signifies the fashion; ex. vestido a la Francesa, dressed after the French fashion.

Sometimes the quality; ex. a prueba de bombas, bomb-proof.

Sometimes it is put for the adverb about; ex. nueve à diez mil hombres, about nine or ten thousand men.

A precedes many adverbs; ex. poco a poco, softly; a trucco, by changing; a brazo partido, by strength of arms; a vista de ojos, evidently; a pecho descubierto, sincerely.

It is also a particle of composition in many verbs, as from deuda, lanza, palo, are formed, abudár, alancear, apalear, &c.

R. These are the principal senses wherein this first letter is used; but there are some others besides, which can hardly be brought under the foregoing significations, or indeed under any particular rules; yet you will find them all in the series of this dictionary.

A, among the antients, was a numeral letter, that stood for five hundred, as it is plain by the following verse:

Possidet A numeros quingentos ordine recto.
But when they put a tittle, or little bar over A, (thus \bar{A}) then it signified five thousand.

 ACCENTO, f. m. accent, tone, pronunciation.
Accento musico, the sweetness of the voice, or softness of sound in music.
 ACCENTO, a note or mark upon words, that regulates their pronunciation, according to the Latins and others. There are three accents, viz. the acute (´), grave (`), and circumflex (^): the circumflex is not used in the Spanish language; the accent grave is only used upon the four vowels, à, è, ò, ù, when one of these vowels makes a word; the acute is the accent more made use of, and it is with this difference, when the pronunciation is long in the last vowel of a word, they put an acute upon that vowel, as in arnés, refrán, azul; but, when the last syllable but one is long in a sentence of more than two vowels, without being followed by two consonants, the acute must be put upon the vowel of the last syllable but one, as in the words, amado, hermoso, agüelo; because in the words, where you find after the vowel two consonants or more, as in madrastra, estrella, enigma, no accent is necessary; likewise, when the last syllable but one is short, you must put the acute upon the last syllable but two, as in cántaro, pífano, &c.

 ACHOTE, it has no other name in English, or any other language, this being the Indian name; it is a hard substance of a very deep red, formerly us'd to be put into chocolate to give it a good colour, and because it is an excellent pectoral. Ray in his history of plants gives this account of it: The mau-cau, or rou-cau tree, between a shrub and a tree, bears a fruit in a cod two or three fingers long, about as big as a plumb; in each cod there are thirty or forty seeds, or grains, each fastned to a little stalk, in the shape of a sharp cone, flattened on both sides; the colour of these seeds or grains is a bright scarlet; they are damp with a juice that dyes the hands if they touch it; these seeds new gather'd are soft like those of an apple, when dry they turn of a deep red. These ground with water, and made up into balls or cakes, are sent over into Europe. Thus far Ray, who calls it achiot; but the true name the Spaniards call it by, is achioté, this steep'd in urine dyes linnen, so that it never washes out.

 ANANAS, this fruit was first carried into India from Brazil, and has throve well; it is as big as a small lemon, very yellow and odoriferous. When ripe it is very delicious to the taste, and juicy; only one grows upon a stalk, which is as tall as an arrichoak, with many small ones about it; which, when they gather the great one, they plant, and each of them produces a plant growing up in a year. This fruit is hot and moist, and is eaten dipp'd in wine. There is another sort which they call ananas bravo, or wild ananas, which grows as high as a horseman's spear, smooth, straight, round, and as thick as an orange tree, the leaves prickly, and a great knot of them at the foot of it, the roots of it are entangled under ground, and sprout up again, one tree producing another, so that they make hedges: On the boughs grows a fruit call'd the wild ananas, because like the other; it is as big as a melon, of a pleasant red, all divided like the Cyprus apple, but at a distance like the pine apple; it is not very pleasant to the taste, and therefore eaten by few. There comes a moisture from the trees and root which is of good use in physick. Christ. Acost. Nat. Hist. E. Ind.

Latin Avellana de la India, or Avila, the tree grows tall, straight, round, slender, and divided by knots from the foot to the top; its leaves longer and broader than those of the cocoa tree. The fruit as big as a walnut, but longish, and is cold and dry, comforts the stomach, prevents vomiting, strengthens the gums and teeth, and if eaten does so stupify, that people in great pain take it to forget their sufferings. It is commonly chew'd with the herb betele. See more of it in Christ. Accl. Nat. Hist. E. Ind. See also BEN.
Avellanas purgativas, purging nuts. Ray calls them, avellanas purgatives n. vi orbis. And in English, Barbadoes nuts. Monardes, fol. 26, says the physicians call them ben mergan, that they purge violently by stool and vomit, and therefore they toast them, which renders their operation more gentle; that they purge phlegm and cholera, are an excellent medicine against the cholick, and expel wind. They are hot in the first point of the third degree, and dry in the second. The dose half a dram toasted; their shape triangular. See Ray and M. nardes.

AXI, the natural pepper of the West-Indies, generally so call'd by the Spaniards, because this was the name of the islands where it was first discovered; for in the language of Cuzco in Peru, they call it uchu, and in Mexico, chile. It grows only in hot valleys which are water'd; there are several colours of it, green, red, and yellow. There is a strong sort which they call caribe, that bites very much; another sort is more mild, and somewhat sweet, which they eat by mouthfuls. A small sort of it smells in the mouth like musk, and is very good. It is only the little fibres and seeds of the axi that bite, the rest does not. It is eaten green, or dry; pounded or whole. It is the chief sauce, and the spice only of the West-Indies. Eaten moderately it helps digestion, but too much of it is very hurtful. F. Jes. Acost. Nat. Hist. W. Ind. lib. 4. cap. 21. pag. 246.

 AZIBAR, f. m. aloes. It is made of the juice of an herb call'd by the Portuguese herba babosa, whereof there is great store in Cambaya, Bengala, and other parts, but that of the island Socotora is most valued, and therefore call'd aloes Succotrina. This plant is not unlike our houseleek, and in Spain the common people will hang one of them with the root and all in their house. It has such a natural moisture, that it holds green all the year. The best aloes are those that are clearest, closest, and freest from sand or dirt, and of a liver colour, brittle, that dissolves soonest, and is bitterest. It is hot in the first degree, and dry in the third. It stops bloody fluxes, dries up inveterate sores, fresh wounds, and brings flesh upon wounds, particularly in the privy parts. It is put to many other uses, which may be seen at large in Acosta's Nat. Hist. of the East-Indies.

 AZO'GUE, f. m. quicksilver, or mercury; it is dug out of mines in stones, together with the vermilion, for those two are always found together. The stones are beaten small, and put into crucibles close stopp'd, where they are run with fire, the quicksilver ascending with the smoke, till it meets with some body, on which it consolidates, or if it meets with no body, it ascends till it grows cold, and then falls down again congeal'd. They do not uncover the crucibles to take out the metal till cold, because the steam of them would kill, or at least endanger those about it. In the West-Indies, the quicksilver is kept in skins. Jos. Acosta's Nat. Hist. West-Indies, l. 4. c. 11. p. 220. The word is Arabick. Vid. Covarr.

AZYMO, MA, adj. unleaven'd.

B.

B, f. f. the second letter of the alphabet, and the first consonant; it is one of the mutes, and is pronounced shutting the lips, as in other languages; but as there is so little difference, in pronunciation in Spanish, between the B and V, that the ignorant indifferently use them in writing as they do in speaking, I believed it was proper to give the following rules.

- 1°. All the words that have a B, in their original or derivation, must be written with a B; as, leber, from bibere; escribir, from scribere; also a few words that have been constantly wrote with a B; as, abogado, baluarte, borla, luzre.
 - 2°. The original of a word being uncertain, it must be written with a B.
 - 3°. The P of some words, originally Latin or Greek, is often changed into B, in the Spanish language; therefore the following words, obispo, from episcopus; and cabildo, from capillus, are wrote with a B, excepting some words that have been constantly written with V; as, Sevilla.
 - 4°. Before the letters L and R, when they are liquid in pronunciation, it is proper and peculiar to the Spanish, to make use of the B; as in the words, blando, doble, bravo, bronce.
- B, among the ancients, was a numeral letter worth 300, according to this verse.
Et B trecentum per se retinere videtur.
 But when it had a title on the top (̄B) then it stood for 3000.

 BALSAMAR, v. a. to embalm.
 BALSAMICO, CA, adj. balsamic, belonging to balsam.
 BALSAMINA, f. f. the herb balm.
 BALSAMO, balsam, of the Indies. It is famous for its delicate scent, and more for its wonderful effect in healing wounds, and cure of several distempers. The tree this balsam comes from, is as big as the pomegranate-tree, or somewhat bigger, and something like it. There is of it white, red, green, and black. It comes from the tree, cutting a gash in it, whence it flows in abundance. Some is pure, which they call espobalivum, and distils from the tree; the other, which is not so good, is extracted from the wood, bark, and leaves, boil'd and press'd, and this they call xibbalivum; besides some adulterate it, mixing other liquors with it. It is only plenty where it less valu'd, for it is no way inferior to the celebrated balsam of New-Spain, and the provinces of Guatimala, and Chiapa, but the best is that of the island of Tolu, not far from Carthagena; which is generally white, and the white is better than the red, that better than the green, and the black the worst. F. J. Acosta, Nat. Hist. W. Ind. lib. 4. cap. 28. p. 263. Those that desire it, may see much more in Munro's, fol. 9. and 84.
Balsamo. To the account above out of Acosta, concerning that balsam of the West-Indies it is not amiss to add a word out of Ray concerning that of the East. He says it is a small shrubby tree, growing as high as priver, bearing very few leaves, like rue. The trees of this balsam grew in former ages in Palestine, and other eastern countries. At present there are great trees of natural balsam in several parts of America, but particularly in the province of Chili, p. 1755. verb. boliamen. Vid. Quix.

BEHEMOTH, generally interpreted a great beast; but by some is made to comprehend all four footed beasts. Hebrew.
 BEHETRI'AS, are lordships, or liberties free from the subjection of any lord, but what they chuse at pleasure, and can discard at will. The law of Spain defines it thus. Behetria, signifies an inheritance belonging to itself, free from him that lives in it, and can receive for its lord, whom it pleases. These are the words of the law literally translated. "There were two sorts of them, the one call'd Behetrias de mar à mar, or from sea to sea; to express, that they might chuse for their lord whom they pleased, from the ocean to the Mediterranean. The other sort was called Behetrias de entre parientes; that is, among kindred, which were oblig'd to chuse their lord of certain families, whose right it was." These are all suppress'd and incorporated into the crown of Spain, though they retain the name and some small privileges. The etymology so uncertain, that it is not worth mentioning: they that will, may see it in Covarrubias. But because these free places are generally full of noise and confusion for want of a sovereign power, therefore behetria is us'd to signify any tumultuous assembly, or confus'd disorderly noise; or as we say, Dover-Court, all talkers, and no hearers.

BETAS, ropes us'd among sailors.
 BETARRAGA, & BETARRATA, f. f. a beet-root.
 BETELE', is a tender plant, that runs up a stick, and the leaf is the delight of the Asiatics; for men and women, from the prince to the peasant, have no greater pleasure than to chew it all day in company, and no visit begins or ends without this herb. Before it they always chew the areca, describ'd in its place, that the coolness of this, as they say, may temper the heat of the other; and they lay a little dissolv'd lime on the betel' leaf, to colour and soften its biting taste. It spends not so well in any part of Asia, as in the Philippine Islands, where the areca is soft and easy to chew. The Spaniards make a composition of both herbs with lime, which they call bays, and carry it in curious boxes, to chew it every moment abroad and at home. The betel makes the lips so fine, red, and beautiful, that if the European ladies could, they would purchase it for the weight in gold. Comelli, vol. 3. lib. 1. cap. 8.

BETIS, the ancient name of the famous river in Spain, now call'd Guadaquivir, which gives its name to the province of Betica.
 BETONICA, f. f. the herb betony.

 BETUMAR, vid. BETUMINAR.
 BETUMEN, f. f. bitumen, a liquid thick substance found in the earth, us'd formerly instead of mortar for building, being very glutinous, and burnt in lamps, as being sulphurous. In Spain, they call any glutinous matter by this name. In the island of Cuba, in America, there is a sort of it flowing out of certain springs, by the sea-side, as black as pitch, which the Indians use in cold distempers: the Spaniards use it mix'd with tallow, to tar their ships. It is good against fits of the mother. Monardes, sel. 7. They also give this name to any daub, and to washes and paints for women's faces.
 BETUMINAR, v. a. to daub with betumen.
 BETUN, vid. BETUMEN.
 BETUNAR, to daub, to caress ships, to use washes to the face.

BEZAA'R, & PIEDRA BEZAA'R, the bezoar-stone. In the West-Indies these are found in the maw, or belly of the Indian sheep (of which you may see more, verb. LAMAS;) sometimes they find in a sheep but one, sometimes two, three, or four; some less than small nuts, others as big as pigeons eggs, and the author has seen some as big as an orange. In shape, some are round, some oval, others irregular. As to colour, there are black, white, greenish, and gold colour. They are made as it were of several layers, or crusts, one upon another. Several creatures are said to produce them besides the Lamas, as the vicuñas, tarugas, and cypréfi. The vicuñas commonly yield the largest, and the tarugas the best. The stone is of excellent use in physick. The best bezoar stones are those brought from the East-Indies, the next to them, those of Peru, and the last in order, those of New-Spain. It has often been found that these stones grow in the beast's maw or belly, upon some bit of iron or stick, which the creature has swallow'd, these things being found in the middle of them, which makes some people believe they are counterfeits; but it is most certain they are not. F. Jof. Acost. Nat. Hist. W. Ind. lib. 4. cap. 42. p. 296. Christ. Acost. Nat. Hist. East Ind. says, the bezoar is found there in a creature somewhat resembling a goat, and a deer, very swift, which the Persians call pazar. The Persians, Arabs, and Corazans, call the stone pazar, from the beast. To know the true bezoar from the counterfeit, they take a little dust of lime, and wetting any part of the stone with the tip of the tongue, rub it upon that dust, which if true, it dyes of a fine green, if false, it either alters not the colour at all, or very little. It is good against all poisons, infections, melancholy, and inveterate distempers, to cherish the spirits, to drive any thing from the heart, to create an appetite, and many more diseases. Christ. Acost. Nat. Hist. E. Ind.

CAJU'S, the tree is not very tall, but thick of boughs and leaves, the fruit is like an apple, red, and yellow within. It is singular in this, that all other sorts of fruit have the stone within, and this has it at the top, raised like a green crest; breaking the stone, the kernel within it roasted, tastes like an almond, and raw, like a new nut. It ripens betwixt February and May. Cut in quarters, steep'd in cold water, and chew'd, there comes from it a cold juice, good for all obstructions in the breast. Gemelli, vol. 3. lib. 1. cap. 8.

CANE'LA, f. f. cinnamon. This excellent bark, now so well known, is taken off a tree about as big as an orange-tree, with a leaf like that of a laurel, and a small fruit about as big as a wild olive. There are abundance of these trees on the coast of Malabar; but the best cinnamon is that of the island of Ceylon: the tree has two barks, and the cinnamon is the second, which being taken off and laid on the ground, turns round with the heat of the sun, and grows red; whereas at first it is of an ash-colour. Every three years there comes a new bark upon the trees. The Arabs call cinnamon, salbaeka, and sch.ka, and quersaa, and quorseen; the Chinese, darchini; the people of Ceylon, whence the best comes, cuando; those of Malaca, c. iman; the Malabars, caniaap; the Canines call the cinnamon, yeche, and the tree, giacra; and all together, recligiacaia. In Greek and Latin it is casia; in Spanish and Portuguese, canéla; in French, cannelé; in Hebrew, cinnamon; and in the Turkish language, darchini. Cinnamon is the true cinnamomum of the ancients, and there is no difference between it and the casia lignea; but that the former is better than the other, and comes from the island Ceylon, as hath been said, as the worst does from Java, and the coast of Malabar. The cinnamon which looks whitish is not well cur'd, and that which is blackish is over dry'd, and the true red is in perfection: it is hot and dry in the third degree. Acessus, Nat. Hist. of the East-Indies, where see more of this matter. p. 1, &c.

Canela de America, cinnamon of America; the tree is of a middling size, the leaf like laurel, green all the year. It bears a fruit in the shape of a little hat, the crown and brims no bigger than a crown piece, the colour deep purple both within and without, smooth within and rough without. On the top of the crown of the hat is a nib by which it hangs to the tree: the brim is about as thick as a crown piece, the upper part thicker. This fruit has exactly the taste and smell of cinnamon, and is put to the same uses; but the bark of the tree has neither smell nor taste of cinnamon. Menardus, fol. 98.

CARME'LITAS, the religious order of Carmelite friars, begun in the twelfth century in Syria, where many Anchorites liv'd dispers'd, and expos'd to the cruelty of the barbarous nations. Almericus, patriarch of Antioch and legate apostolic, gather'd them into a body, and plac'd them on mount Carmelus, where the prophets Elias and Elisha had liv'd, whence they took the name of Carmelites, and even pretend to be successors of Elias, and of his institution. Albertus, patriarch of Jerusalem, in the year 1205, gave them their rule, and Pope Honorius the III. confirm'd it two years after. Their habit is a sad-colour loose garment down to their heels, like a cassock, girt about them, and over that a white cloak down to the ground. Pope Innocent the IVth mitigated the severity of their first institution; hence sprung afterwards the Carmelitas descalzos, that is, the barefoot Carmelites, for the order, as has been said, being fallen from its rigour, S. Teresa undertook a reformation, and reduc'd it to its primitive severity. The habit of these religious is coarser than that of the others, and their cloak less, and they go bare legg'd, wearing sandals on their feet, besides other hardships in their manner of living.

 CHUE'CO, vid. CHOCAR.
 CHU'FA, what name positively to give this I do not find. Covarrubias says, it is a small sort of fruit growing under ground, sticking to the root, much sought by children, who call it cucas. He adds, there are abundance of them in the kingdom of Valencia; and that Peter John Nuñez, a most learned man, told him the word chufas was derived from the Greek χούφας, (which Ray in his Hist. Plant. calls cyprus, or English galingale, p. 1299.) and this cyperos, he says differs from the chufas only in the nuts these latter produce; so it is not the same as the cyperos. Oudin in his Spanish and French dictionary gives them no particular name, but calls them chefnuts of the earth, that the children call them chucas, and that the field mice lay up their winter provision of them. Jerome Victor, in his French, Spanish, and Italian dictionary has no mention of it, but only turns the word chufa, a jest, a scoff; more of it I cannot find, but by what is said, make no difficulty to conclude, that these chufas, are no other than those we call pignuts.

Echar a una persona un S, y un clávo, to burn a man with an S and the shape of a nail on the face, which is the mark of a slave; met. it is to lay such obligations upon a man, as shall bind him to one for ever.
Un clávo saca otro, one nail drives out another.
Clávo de espéca, clove. The tree is like a bay-tree, with a very thick head, and the leaf smaller, neither very thick nor thin. This tree bears abundance of blossoms, which all turn into cloves. The flower is first white, then green, when it has the shape of the clove, and soon grows hard and turns ruffet, and when gathered and dried, black. It grows upon the very boughs of the tree, and fewest of them at the foot of the leaves; one, two, three, or four grow out of one stalk. When the trees are loaded, they smell fragrant at a distance. All the cloves brought into Europe come from the Molucco islands. The trees are wild and never planted nor grafted. The clove is gather'd from September till February, and that which is not gather'd one year grows bigger against the next. When gather'd, it is dry'd for some days in the sun. The green cloves are preserv'd, and others laid in pickle to eat. These trees the islanders say are eight years growing, and last an hundred. The clove in Latin is call'd caupyllus; in Arabic, Persian, and Turkish, coroyil; in Molucco, chivava; in Spanish as above; in Portuguese, cravos; in French, clou de girofle; in High Dutch, negelin. The clove and the nutmeg trees are nothing alike, as some people have conceited, and the reader may see under the word nuez moscada, or nutmeg. Art. Nat. Hist. Ind. where the curious may see more of it.

C O C

CO'CA, f. f. is a small green leaf growing on little trees or bushes about a man's height, in excessive hot and very moist land. The tree bears this leaf every four months. It requires much care in cultivating, and much more to preserve it when gather'd. They lay it very orderly into long narrow baskets, which they load on the sheep of the country, and they travel with this commodity in flocks carrying two or three thousand baskets. It generally grows in the country they call Los Andes, in bottoms which are intolerably hot, where it rains most part of the year; and it costs the Indians intolerable labour and many lives to look after it, because they go for it from the cold mountains. The use of it is only to chew and suck the juice of it, but not swallow the leaf. It doubtless is nourishing, for the Indians will travel great journeys, or do any other great labour without eating, with only a handful of coca. It has an unpleasant taste, and they powder it with ashes, or lime. F. Jes. Acost. Nat. Hist. W. Ind. lib. 4. cap. 22. p. 252.

Guarda el coco, an expression used to deter children, as our English nurses through ignorance frighten the children, by bidding them take care of the bugabo.

Coco, ó palma de las Indias, the cocotree, otherwise call'd the palm-tree, because like the palm, being tall, hard, and putting out greater branches, the higher they rise. The fruit call'd also cocos, or coco-nuts by us, have a shell whereof they make drinking cups; the kernel tastes somewhat like a new almond, but when hanging on the tree, all within is water, which they drink as a great dainty, and to cool them in hot weather. They say the tree puts out a new cluster of coco-nuts every month, so that it produces twelve times in a year; they are commonly as big as a small musk-melon. There is another sort they call coquiles, or little coco-nuts, which is a better sort of fruit, and grows in the kingdom of Chile; they are somewhat less than walnuts, but rounder. There is yet another sort, which are in it like the seeds of a pomgranate; these almonds are three times as big as those of Castile, and taste like them, but are a little harder; they are also juicy and oily, they are pleasant to eat, and for want of the others serve to make marchpanes, and such like dainties: They call them almonds of the Andes, because abundance of them grow in the Andes of Peru, and they are so hard, that they require a great stroke with a stone to break them. F. Jes. Acost. Nat. Hist. W. Ind. lib. 4. cap. 26. pag. 259. In the Maldivy islands they build, rig, and fit out ships from this tree alone, which furnishes all the timber, masts, yards, sails, and rigging, and when fit to sail, they load her with commodities from the same tree, as oil, wine, vinegar, black sugar, fruit and strong water. With this tree alone they build good houses, and cover them with the leaves. The body of the tree affords timber for building; of the leaves they make sails, of the outward shell of the nut all the cordage and rigging. The wine is made by cutting a branch of the tree, and putting a vessel under, into which that liquor distils, and is call'd sara; this feveral times distill'd, becomes a strong water, whereof there are two sorts, the best call'd fula, and the second fort arab, or, as we call it, rack; the same fula set in the sun becomes vinegar. After the first running of the fula from the tree, they receive the last running in another vessel, which boil'd, becomes sugar, call'd there jagra. The inward hard shell serves to make cups and dishes, and is also used for firing by curious goldsmiths in those parts. Of the nut enough has been said; but in the East-Indies they dry it, and so keep it all the year, carrying it to several parts. Of this dried kernel they also make very good oil, and another sort of it green. Acoft. Nat. Hist. of the East Ind.

 DEVASTAR, v. a. to destroy, to ruin, to lay waste.
Devastar y recoger quinientos sueldos, and to revenge five hundred pence: this is an expression to signify a person's being a gentleman, and took its rise from the following occasion. The Spaniards of Old Castile being oblig'd to pay a yearly tribute of 500 virgins to the Moors; after several battles in which the Spaniards succeeded, the tribute was changed from 500 virgins, to 500 sueldos, or pieces of Spanish coin. But in process of time, the Spaniards wisely resenting the injury offered them, made war upon the Moors, and by force of arms deliver'd themselves from that gross imposition. This heroic action being perform'd by men of figure and fortune, they characterise it by this expression: a man of bravery, honour, resolution, and a true lover of his country.

Los dislates de Juan de la Encina, the absurdities of John de la Encina. This John de la Encina was a very learned man in Salamanca, who compos'd a sort of doggerel rhymes, extraordinary ingenious; but so con-triv'd, that they sound like absurdities, under which much wit and judgment is couch'd. These took so well with all sorts of people, that many other serious things he compos'd, were lost; and it remain'd a proverb, when any body spoke absurdly, to say, They are the absurdities of John de la Encina. He being upon a journey, the inn-keeper's wife heard the servants name their master John de la Encina, whereupon she slept up to him, and gazing in his face, said, Sir, was it you that compos'd the absurdities? at which he was much out of countenance, and gave her some hard words, wherein he was guilty of the greatest absurdity.

ELEBORO, f. m. the herb hellebore, whereof there are two sorts, black and white. The name Greek. It is common, and therefore I say no more of it, but refer the reader to Desfcorides, or to Ray's Hist. Plant. pag. 697.
 ELECHHO, f. m. the most common plant, in England call'd fern, of which there are several sorts; but the two chief, the male and female, both of them enemies to women, causing them to miscarry. The root of it powder'd, and half an ounce of it drunk with honey, kills worms. In some parts of England they make round balls of the ashes of it, which serve instead of soap. Thus far Ray, in his Hist. of Plant., where see more of it. I must add one thing, which is, that fortunetellers, and other such cheats, pretend to have the seed of the female fern, which the wisest cannot find; and what is worse, they impose upon ignorant, superstitious people, and sell them something for it, which they say will make them fortunate and belov'd, and such like follies and frauds.

bar, which is the most common. The root of it is the only part used, being medicinal. The Canarines and Brachmans eat it with rice, with fish, and with fallad. In Malabar they make cakes of it, which they eat as a great dainty, and for any weakness or coldness in the stomach, gripes, any distempers in the matrix, and difficulty in making water. It is a great mistake of those who take this galanga to be the root of juncus oratus. It is hot and dry in the third degree. Besides what has been said, it is good against the cholick; chew'd, it corrects an ill breath, helps digestion, and cures all cold pains; finelt to, it relieves a cold brain; it is good against the palpitation of the heart, heats the cold reins, and is a provocative to venery. *Christ. HIGO, f. m. a fig. Latin figus. It is also taken for the piles or hemorrhoids.

Higo del río, a plant growing in waters call'd nenuphar, or water-lily.

Higo de la India y América, this is a fruit growing in India and on the coast of Africa, and most generally known by the name of lucuma, but the Arab and Persians call it mos. The tree is about fourteen or fifteen feet high.

confisting of many rinds or leaves growing one upon another. The trunk about the thickness of a man's leg. The root round and thick, and the common food of elephants. The leaf a bright green within, and a darker without; about two yards long, and near a yard wide. From the heart of the tree shoots a sprout about the thickness of a man's arm, divided by many knots, and on each of them ten or fourteen figs; in all from 100 to 200, and never more than this. One branch bears them. They are of several sorts, of a very pleasant taste and smell. Some of them are a span deep in thickness, and are eaten fresh with wine, cinnamon, and sugar; and they are kept preserved with sugar and cinnamon. The Indian physicians give these figs to people in fevers and other distempers: yet others say they are hurtful to the stomach. When the figs are ripe, the branch that bears them is cut off, and the tree withers, and is given to the tame elephants; and from the root springs another. Some are of opinion, that this was the forbidden fruit which made Adam transgress. They that desire to see more of it, may read Christ. Acst. Nat. Hist. E. I. l.

Prov. El figo que cae y no se levanta, es bueno para mi garganta; el figo que no cae, es bueno para mi febre: the fig that falls and does not rise, is good for my throat; the fig that leaps is good for my master. So said a waggish servant who eat all the best figs himself, and gave the worst to his master; for those figs that fall and do not rise, are such as are soft and thorough ripe; those that leap or rebound when they fall, are hard and not ripe.
